Why did the chicken cross the road?

What organizational hurdles lurk in the way?

Technical roadblocks?

Together we will solve riddles and excavate true requirements, archaeologist hats optional.

But first, an introduction.

I grew up on a farm and learned a particular definition of hard work. In that environment it was also necessary to become well versed in how to deal with unexpected failures, often several at once. However the most enduring lesson may be knowing there are many paths to the same outcome, each with their own perils, but none of them will get you there if you don't start traveling.

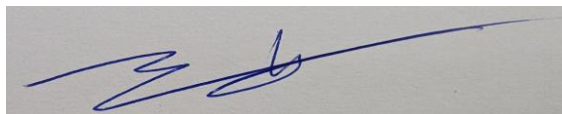

My journey thus far has taken me on the paths of tech support, web developer, healthcare consultant, data analyst, database developer, system architect, marketing analyst, supply chain planner, project champion, master data manager, data governor, and system owner.

During this time I've managed people, projects, processes, technology, and expectations. Most of all, I have nurtured my ability to learn and adapt, because everything changes and usually sooner than you would like it to.

My experiences have shaped a leadership style rooted in empathy and influenced by the Agile manifesto. My teams know they are high performers, and by knowing they become even more so.

I believe together we can accomplish great things, and maybe even have fun doing it.

Sincerely,

Corey H. Hart
